

Call for volunteers

The Institute for the Future of the Mind is conducting important research into the effects of 21st century technology on the minds of both adults and children. As part of their research, investigators at the Institute are looking at how communication technologies influence the way we think and the way we interact with the world.

The Institute is looking for volunteers to assist in a simple psychological study to help gain a greater understanding of the impact of technology on our thinking processes. Please contact the Institute if you are:

- Aged 18 to 21 or 35 to 39
- Have normal or corrected to normal colour vision
- Able to spare half an hour to visit a city centre location for assessments
- Not currently receiving treatment for depressive illness

Should you choose to contribute to this valuable research, the Institute will pay £10 to cover travel costs and to reimburse you for your time. All participants will be free to withdraw from the study at any time, without giving a reason.

For more information, or to volunteer, please contact Martin Westwell
Institute for the Future of the Mind
University Department of Pharmacology, Mansfield Road, Oxford OX1 3QT
Tel: 01865 281528
email: martin.westwell@pharm.ox.ac.uk

The Institute for the Future of the mind

